

Prompt:

Turn each photo I upload into its own standalone "rubber stamp travel field note" poster.

Output one image per photo

- never a collage.

LAYOUT

Use a 4:3 landscape composition split into a left and a right zone, with no visible dividing line between them.

LEFT (~58% of the frame)

Keep the original photo faithfully intact. Preserve the subject's identity, the terrain, architecture, vegetation, people, spatial relationships, natural light and shadow, real texture, and the original color mood. Apply only a restrained, art-publication-grade photographic grade plus very fine film grain. You may crop naturally to fit the layout, but never stretch, warp, move, replace, or redraw the subject.

RIGHT (~42% of the frame)

Use warm off-white aged paper as the background. The paper should show fine fibers, natural speckle, light handling wear, and a matte surface. Leave large areas completely unprinted - the white space is a key part of the composition, not filler.

THE STAMP

Study the original photo and pull out only the most location-defining elements: the main silhouette, architectural structure, the lay of the land, the posture of the vegetation, roads, a shoreline, or whatever key visual relationship defines the place. Compress those into a single small multicolor rubber stamp image.

Do not copy everything in the photo. Keep only the minimum information needed for someone to recognize the location, the subject, and the scene at a glance. Remove crowds, vehicles, dense rows of windows, repeated buildings, fussy small vegetation, decorative trim, and irrelevant background.

Place the stamp in the lower-middle portion of the paper zone. It should occupy only about 30-38% of that zone's height, with generous white space around it. Never scale it up into a regular illustration, a complete landscape painting, or a brand logo.

Turn each photo I upload into its own standalone "rubber st.

Let the original composition decide how the stamp is organized:

- Landmark building: keep the most recognizable outline, roofline, dome, arches, tower, or main structure.
- Hillside settlement: compress the buildings into a few stepped blocks of color following the terrain.
- Coastal scenery: keep the slope of the headland, the tiers of the settlement, the shoreline, and a few broken water lines.
- Distant cityscape: keep the main skyline, one landmark building, and one or two layers of distant hills.

- Natural landscape: keep the directional relationship between the main landform, trees, water's edge, or road.
- Foreground objects: keep them as a foreground stamp silhouette only if they matter to the story of the original image.

INK & COLOR

Extract 2-4 spot inks from the original photo. Favor desaturated tones like charcoal black, deep green, brick red, ochre, gray-blue, and gray-brown - but don't force a fixed palette onto the image. Keep the color character that makes the original photo recognizable, and allow only one small area of color as a visual accent.

Every color must look like it was stamped separately by hand: authentic carved-rubber texture, hand-cut marks, uneven line weight, gaps in the outline, broken edges, dry ink starvation, paper showing through, grainy ink, uneven pressure, slight ghosting in places, and about 1-2 mm of registration drift between colors.

Natural misalignment between color layers is expected, and edges must never look digitally smooth. The result should read as a genuinely carved stamp pressed onto old paper - not a filtered photo, not a smooth vector illustration, not a line-art logo.

TEXT

the photo:

Generate the text from the location, subject, and visual motifs in

[Location name in English]

No. [number]

[three short English keywords]

[year]

Set it below the stamp or in the adjacent white space, in a small, restrained typewriter face with a touch of mechanical imprecision. The typesetting should look like a traveler's field record, not an ad headline. Spell everything correctly, and add no extra taglines, brands, or decorative copy.

OVERALL FEEL

Like a field notebook kept by an architect, a travel writer, or a naturalist: quiet, restrained, tactile, specific to its place, with the imperfections of handwork and the feel of something collected. The photo's job is to record what was there; the stamp's job is to keep the part of it worth remembering.

AVOID

An obvious center divider, circular seals, red Chinese chops, stamp perforations, wax seals, sticker collages, souvenir-shop templates, smooth vector logos, generic city icons, copying every building, overly dense engraving, a childlike craft look, cartoon styling, 3D rendering, plastic texture, smooth digital gradients, oversaturation, too much text, decorative clutter - and any redrawing or alteration of the original photo on the left.